

THE DEMAND FOR GOLD.

More of the Yellow Metal to Be Sent to New York.

The officers charged with the administration of the fiscal affairs of the government are naturally much concerned over the serious decrease in the treasury gold holdings since the first of the year. The exports of gold have been unusually large and there are surface indications of further drains on the national exchequer to meet foreign demands for gold. It was expected that these shipments would stop long before this, but brokers for foreign houses continue the "run" and give no indication that the tide has reached its flood. The engagements for the present week amount to about $1,000,000, most of which, as usual, comes from the national treasury, and so much more may be taken out the following week. The gold balance is $105,500,000, and the point at which it will be exhausted is not known. This amount includes the $100,000,000 reserved especially for the redemption of legal-tender notes; therefore regarded as a sum secured to that purpose, leaving $8,500,000 "free gold" available for the business of the government.

RESISTANCE IN TOUCHING THE GOLD RESERVE.

While the present Secretary of the Treasury has frequently expressed his anxiety to draw on the gold reserve fund in case of emergency, it is likely that he could do with considerable reluctance and that he has used his utmost endeavor to avoid a condition calling for the exercise of such discretion. The department is in somewhat of a dilemma in this matter. It naturally desires to part with its gold, but, at the same time, it is compelled by law to honor a legitimate demand for that metal without the risk of precipitating a financial panic.

It is therefore properly settled that there will be no change whatever in the policy of the department until a time arrives when it can be taken that can possibly excite the slightest apprehension in the minds of the most conservative financiers. Congress is thoroughly informed on the situation and it is for that body to apply whatever remedy it deems essential.
